Hello, my name is Robert Beers. I am here doing a double major in History and Anthropology. I have chosen them, majors, because I believe that history is a very important overlooked part of how civilization works. Why you ask, well with the study of history you can see how the world of civilizations worked, add in Anothrolpology which is the study of people and then you can learn not only how the civilizations of the past were but also how the people lived.

There was this time when I first began my journey in college, I started off with a major in computer science. I was good at working on computers so people would bring their computers for me to work on. This one day started off as a normal day, a student came and asked if I could help them with their computer, and as I was asking questions as to what the problem was I got suspicious that he may not have been the owner of said computer. What provoked this was that he said he forgot his computer's password, now that is not unheard of but being in college and having to use your computer a lot to do research and write papers I thought that was wrong. I decided I would still take it on and told the guy I would call him when I completed it. Once the guy walked away I took the computer with me and went into the dorm building's advisor, I then told him about my suspicions, and he then told me that a computer was listed as stolen so he called in the sheriff's that were acting as security for the campus. We talked to them and they told me to remove the password and try and find anything that could ID who owns the computer.

Once I removed the password from the computer I began my search for proof of ownership. I finally found it once I opened skype the account logged into it had a picture of a person I knew and his name. I called the dorm director and told him. The sheriffs then came up to my room. They told me this was how it was going to go, they said I was to call the people and tell them that the computer was done, lead them into the room where they would be hiding to bust them. I agreed to what they said, called the people, and informed them I have removed the password and that the computer was ready for pickup, they then told me that they would be there in a few. I waited, working on some papers I had to work on for classes not talking as to make anyone think there was anything wrong. There was a knock at my door, I opened it and sure enough there they were, I let them come inside, and they asked me how I removed the password, which I refused to tell them to collect the money, and as they were leaving the sheriffs office came out. The people were arrested and charged with possession of the stolen property, they were kicked out of college and the other guy got his laptop back.
